

You didn't go to film school, you went a liberal arts college. Can you tell me about the value of a liberal arts education and how that has informed your professional career?

Josh Gad made a great statement after the last debate about a war on decency that's going on in America. Since you contend with a lot of comments on social platforms, I ask what decency means to you and why it is important to you personally that we build a decent society?

Like all artists, you have experienced rejection. Indeed, Hillary Clinton lost her first battle with healthcare reform and her first bid for the presidency. How does rejection enable us to become better at what we do, and how will those experiences make Hillary Clinton a better president?

You were the first woman to win a DGA award for directing a comedy series. As a gay man, I am indebted to the LGBT community that fought for rights before me, and you are indebted to women who blazed the path for you today. Why should we stand up today and advocate for the advancement of the rights that others have fought hard to secure?

For most of American history, women didn't have the right to vote. What would it mean for a qualified champion of women like Hillary Clinton to make history as the first female president?

You interviewed Hillary Clinton early on in the campaign for your Lenny platform. What was it like to talk with her in person? What was she like when the cameras weren't rolling?

You've traveled all over the country campaigning for Hillary. What did you expect it to be like? What has it actually been like?

What's it like to interview someone who everyone has an opinion about? What did you learn?

Millennials are an important voice, our votes directly impact the future. Why is it important for us to go vote?
